

Elector

Daniel Bloyce

Daniel is a Senior Lecturer in the Sociology of Sport at the University of Chester. He first started researching baseball in Great Britain in 1994 as part of an undergraduate dissertation project, having developed a passion for the game after watching the Toronto Blue Jays play on a trip to Canada. Since then, Daniel has completed a PhD thesis with the University of Leicester in 2004 examining the globalization of baseball, which included substantial archival analysis of the development of the game in Great Britain. From his thesis, he has published numerous academic articles that focus on British baseball in a variety of journals, including the International Journal of the History of Sport, Sporting Traditions, Journal of Historical Sociology, Sport in History, and also Nine: A Journal of Baseball History and Culture.